

IRAN ATTACKS WITH INVISIBLE FLEET AT THE ATLANTIC OCEAN

The information was about Iranian invisible fleet attacking at the Atlantic Ocean. In the beginning, all the websites containing the information were gathered into a list. Details such as author, date, sources and so on, were identified in order to find out whether the information was true or not. The article contained a photo, which was later been searched if it appeared in other publications and if so, how many times. In the same time, the text of the other publications was examined to identify the relativity with the initial information.

Actually, the result of the research was that new army technology permits to warships not to be identified by radars. That specific information was misinterpreted by the author who claimed that Iran would deploy “invisible warships” to the Atlantic Ocean.

The main conclusion of the students’ research was that true information can be used in different contexts to influence public opinion.
